I grew up in Missouri and lived there 20 years, but never saw a tornado let alone an F4. I flew out of KC after NARPM the same day Joplin was wiped out. Not a cloud in the sky on takeoff, but by the time we landed the tornado had already hit. Frankly, I would prefer earthquakes any day.

We had only minor hail here along with the rain, which started around 9 pm. Moore, which got hit (again) with a tornado, I passed through on my way home at ~ 5 pm, the tornado hit about 6:30. So I didn't have any problems – it's spring time in OK, this is unfortunately about what we expect.

Eva – glad to see you made it home. That weather report did not look good. I trust your place weathered the storm ok?

Don –

I appreciate your willingness to provide additional information when we have questions about some part of the SEE process or other aspects of the ST-12 site. To make the information you provided yesterday more understandable, and to put it in perspective, it would be helpful if you could:

- Correct the dates on the graph for W37 before bailing/pumping (I don't believe you were out there measuring depths in 1900)
- Put these before and after graphs for W37 on the same scales so that they can be more easily compared (it might be helpful if you sent them as an Excel file so I can play with the scales as I want to)
- Please provide the table with the complete history of the amount of LNAPL removed from W37, so we can see how much was accumulating there prior to the start of SEE

Thanks - Eva
